Credit card processing

Before your item ships, you'll notice a pre-authorization hold in the amount of your order on your card statement. The pre-authorization validates the credit card number, status, available credit and billing information. Once an authorization is received, you may notice a decrease in your available credit line. At this point your card hasn't been charged yet.

Your credit card will be charged only after your item ships. If you've ordered multiple items, part of your order may ship separately and some items may ship individually or from multiple locations to ensure you can use your new gear as quickly as possible. When part of an order ships separately, your card will be charged individually based on the value of each shipment.

Pre-authorization holds are removed at the time your card is charged. Your bank or credit card company may put a hold on this dollar amount for a specified period of time. Each financial institution has a different policy on the time period to clear authorization holds.
